Peptide Design Strategy: Basics, Optimization, and Application

β -sheet formation is a final consideration in peptide design. During synthesis, β -sheet formation causes incomplete solvation of the growing peptide and results in a high degree of deletion sequences in the final product.

Among all peptides, cyclic [HR]4 peptide was able to improve the delivery of a cell impermeable fluorescence-labeled phosphopeptide by two-fold. Fatty acids of different alkyl chain length were attached at the N-terminal of the linear peptide (HR)4 to improve the molecular transporter property.

The first peptide synthesis, as well as the creation of the term "peptide," was reported by Fischer and Fourneau (Fischer and Fourneau, 1901). Bergmann and Zervas created the first reversible N^α-protecting group for peptide synthesis, the carbobenzyoxy (Cbz) group (Bergmann and Zervas, 1932).

Design of peptide hormone and neurotransmitter analogues Victor J. Hruby Peptides are being found to be increasingly important as hormones and neurotransmitters, and much research is directed towards elucidating the physiological roles of these natural products in pain, reproduction, maintenance of blood glucose levels etc.

Design of peptide hormone and neurotransmitter analogues

The design and synthesis of peptidomimetics are most important because of the dominant position peptide and protein-protein interactions play in molecular recognition and signaling, especially in living systems.

Peptidomimetics, a synthetic tool of drug discovery

At the Proteomics and Peptide Synthesis Core, we work with each investigator to form an individual plan for project goals and emphasize customization of the experimental design that matches any budget.
